A novel approach for monitoring gene expression in prenatal and postnatal rat uteri: a comparative study using an RNA-binding protein and EGFP. Transgenic mouse models have allowed us to gain insight into the basic biology of the developing uterus by examining how genes are regulated during uterine cell differentiation. Although RNA binding proteins (RBPs) are known to play a role in local translation and translational repression of specific mRNAs, it is not known how RBPs function at the level of transcription in the developing uterine luminal epithelium. We have found that RNA binding protein 4 (RBP4), a ubiquitously expressed member of the RBP family of RNA binding proteins, is expressed in the uterine luminal epithelium. Using a RBP-targeted transcriptional reporter assay, we find that RBP4 is most likely a general repressor of transcription, thus presenting a unique mechanism for regulating epithelial gene expression. In order to gain additional insight into the role of RBP4 in the developing rat uterus, we have generated transgenic rat lines that carry an RBP4-enhanced green fluorescent protein (EGFP) fusion protein, in which EGFP is attached to the first 36 amino acids of the RBP4 protein. When analyzed using a fluorescence-based transgenic rat reporter line, we find that expression of EGFP-RBP4 is associated with uter
