Combination of renal angiotensinogen-I receptor blockade and angiotensin-converting enzyme inhibition in spontaneous hypertension: effects on angiotensin generation. The interaction between the angiotensin-converting enzyme (ACE) inhibitor lisinopril and the Ang-I receptor blocker, losartan, on blood pressure and arterial pressure responses to acute and subpressor angiotensin infusion were studied in spontaneously hypertensive rats (SHR) and normotensive Wistar-Kyoto (WKY) rats. Rats were chronically treated for 6 days with vehicle or losartan (10 mg x kg<sup>-1</sup> x day<sup>-1</sup>) or lisinopril (10 mg x kg<sup>-1</sup> x day<sup>-1</sup>) and then given an acute i.v. injection of vehicle or the ACE inhibitor lisinopril (10 mg x kg<sup>-1</sup>) plus either vehicle or the Ang-I receptor blocker losartan (10 mg x kg<sup>-1</sup>). After 7 days of continuous treatment, blood pressure was significantly elevated in SHR compared with WKY rats. With losartan treatment, the blood pressure (BP) was moderately decreased whereas lisinopril caused a more marked and sustained reduction in blood pressure compared with vehicle treatment. The combination of losartan plus lisinopril decreased BP to a greater extent than each monotherapy (i.e., inhibition of the AT1 receptor by losartan or inhibition of the angiotensin II-generating enzymes by lisinopril), and this combination
