The video shows April Haynes standing with a group of supporters at a get-out-the-vote event in Denver, the City Council president in the Colorado City Council said, according to CBS Denver. “We are at a pivotal point in our history, and where our President stands on gun control, is at stake,” Haynes said. “If you do not believe this is true, then just wait for when President Trump is out of office and the Democratic Party will be in charge.” The videos were captured from a stairwell at the Colorado Collegiate School, which Haynes is running to become principal. The recording caught Haynes making claims that are at odds with what the Trump administration has said about gun control and other issues. The videos show the gathering was not actually a campaign event, and Haynes was not actually speaking for her campaign. Haynes’s running mate, candidate for treasurer Shane Hambrick, who is white, has since quit the race, a spokesman for the Colorado City Council President told TheDCNF. He made a similar statement. (

From "The Riddler" to "Krusty the Clown," there's no shortage of characters in pop culture for people to make fun of. As a recent study noted, nearly 40% of us say we've been a part of a face-swap hoax. But at least one famous Prince has decided it's time to put a stop to it. On Monday, the Duke of Edinburgh announced he was pulling the trademarks on a handful of famous characters, including James Gandolfini's alter ego, "Tony Soprano" from "The Sopranos," from using them on merchandise and in any entertainment. A source told the Wall Street Journal the decision "was an attempt to stop impersonators ripping off the image of the Duke of Edinburgh." The Wall Street Journal also reported that the ban was not likely to lead to more copyright issues for those who impersonated the Prince's look. Other "irresponsible behavior" cited as reasons for the ban includes impersonating the Prince's face on license plates. This content is imported from Third party. The news comes about a year after the Royal Family announced the British public was finally getting to meet Prince Philip, formerly titled the Duke of Edinburgh. An online survey from Ask.com and Pollcode found that 72% of respondents thought it would be an interesting opportunity for the public to meet the Prince. Some 67% said they'd be interested in meeting the Duke. A spokesperson told the Wall Street Journal that the palace is working with "top brands" to help implement the trademark ban. The Journal reported that the move is the latest in an ongoing effort to control Prince Philip's image online. Earlier this year, the Duke of Edinburgh announced he was calling off his official duties as the Prince Consort. As the son of King George VI and the uncle of Queen Elizabeth II, Philip had served the role as the Prince Consort since 1936 and took the title on becoming the Duke of Edinburgh in 1952. During their time together, the Duke and f30f4ceada
