TextPro is a kind of helpful desktop for Mac people. It can remove line break to make a text easier to read, it can make it print out full-page documents, and it can automatically remove line breaks. How? We'll get to that in a bit. The program interface is somewhat straightforward. You can set up your settings, and then click on the button to use TextPro to do some work. The first thing you'll want to do is open an email document and start typing. Then go back to TextPro and click Edit; from the menu bar, choose Markup. You should see some markers indicating where line breaks have been removed. Clicking on those will extract the text to a plain text document. Go to File, Print and then Print To File to get a copy of the document to print out. You can also change the font of the text; adjust the appearance of the text; use a variety of options to make the font bold, underline, and italic; and even add colors. The ability to put a signature at the end is nice. The program also supports iPad and iPhone and will automatically convert the text into regular and tiny type sizes, which is nice. When you click on Markup, you'll get two more menus: Markup Options and TextPro Options. You can set the font, text wrap, and paragraph settings; as well as the size of the paragraph. TextPro also has a bunch of document appearance options: And they're
