This article examines the role of nurse self-esteem in enhancing the quality of nurse-client relationships. It describes the nature and function of self-esteem, delineates the two sources of self-esteem, relates them to nurse-client relationships, and considers implications for nurse education and nursing practice. In the nurse-client relationship, nurses' self-esteem affects their perceptions of themselves and their clients. As a result, nurses with low self-esteem are more likely to assume a role of powerlessness, and in turn, to perceive their clients in such a way that they are perceived by their clients as powerless. Nurses with high self-esteem are more likely to assume a role of competence, and in turn, to perceive their clients as competent. The basis of the nurse-client relationship is thus perceived competence and perceived powerlessness. As nurses perceive their clients in the former role more often, they develop a more egalitarian patient-nurse relationship. To affect this change in nurse-patient relationship, nurses need to develop high self-esteem and to increase their ability to recognize and acknowledge themselves as competent.Q: Why onclick event only triggering once, even if it is set to "onclick" multiple times?
