There's nothing worse than hitting the gym for the first time only to end up throwing up in the toilet. I remember when I was in primary school and made the mistake of drinking a big drop of lemon juice. I was shocked that I ended up puking my guts out. Likewise when you exercise for the first time you need to know the difference between sweat and vomiting, and the best ways to ease your body into working out. Here's the difference between the two and some helpful advice. Sweating Sweating is a natural process that involves your body losing fluid in the form of a liquid, and is a sign that you are working hard or exercising! A sweat is like a water-cooler filled with your body. While you are working out, your body is in a state of high metabolism and the cells are dying. This process releases energy from the food you're eating and therefore, it's a good sign that you're doing something right. Your body releases many of the toxins, including sodium, that have been stored within you and forms a natural medicine called perspiration. Bearing in mind how important exercise is to your health, it's important to know how to deal with the aches and pains. When you exercise you need to make sure your muscles are warm, as in they're getting more blood flow. You may feel the ache (or pain) in your muscles but if you keep moving it will get better. As your body is wearing out it's important to replenish the fluids and nutrients to keep your muscles in fighting condition. If you feel weak you need to drink more than normal! If you'
