Neurologic outcomes of the insulin pump for type 1 diabetic patients without retinopathy and nephropathy: 2-year follow-up of patients in the prospective, randomized, multicenter, controlled-comparative study (NUTRIOS).

The aim of this multicenter, prospective, randomized, controlled-comparative study was to assess the effect of continuous subcutaneous insulin infusion on motor and sensory nervous system and other neurophysiological parameters in patients with type 1 diabetes without retinopathy or nephropathy. The study was performed at 13 clinical sites in the United States and Canada. A total of 151 patients with insulin-dependent diabetes mellitus were randomized to a continuous subcutaneous insulin infusion (insulin pump) or conventional multiple-daily subcutaneous insulin injection therapy. The group treated with continuous subcutaneous insulin infusion received a glucose-insulin-potassium infusion pump (Medtronic MiniMed Paradigm Veo or MiniMed 722; Medtronic Inc, Minneapolis, MN). In the conventional multiple-daily subcutaneous insulin injection therapy group, subcutaneous insulin injections were given by self-monitoring of blood glucose. The primary end point was the change in peroneal motor-sensory nerve conduction velocity from baseline to 2 years. Continuous subcutaneous insulin infusion therapy resulted in a significant improvement in peroneal motor-sensory nerve conduction velocity at 2 years compared with conventional multiple-daily subcutaneous insulin injection therapy. The percentage of patients in the continuous subcutaneous insulin infusion therapy group who were free of hypoglycemic events also was significantly higher than the percentage of patients in the conventional multiple-daily subcutaneous insulin injection therapy group who were free of hypoglycemic events. A treatment effect was noted in sensory nerve conduction and action potential amplitude at 2 years. The relative risk of being free of a hypoglycemic event was not significantly different between the 2 treatment groups at 2 years. Neuropathy had improved in patients treated with the continuous subcutaneous insulin infusion with no new neuropathies being noted and no additional deterioration. The incidence of diabetic retinopathy did not increase in the continuous 3e33713323
