India's traditional vote base in decline The Bharatiya Janata Party's landslide election victory in India has triggered much debate over what policy changes are needed to ensure that the country achieves its longstanding dream of becoming a developed economy. The election of India's first non-Congress government, following the BJP's landslide victory in the national election on 7 May, has triggered debate over what policy changes are needed to ensure that the country achieves its longstanding dream of becoming a developed economy. Overall, the results of the election have raised hopes for economic reforms, with India's new prime minister, Narendra Modi, prioritising these during his campaign. Specifically, there is enormous speculation that he will bring in legislation that will introduce greater market reforms in India's creaking economy to achieve lower inflation and a higher growth rate. But many economists argue that the global slowdown and the softening of the Indian rupee are likely to trump any policy reforms. India is a victim of what economists call "stagflation". It is a combination of slow growth and high inflation, which results in low levels of real growth. The sluggish growth and the downward pressure on the currency is severely hitting India's large expatriate workers, who are the cornerstone of the country's service industry. The main reason for this is India's growing dependence on exports. The collapse in the rupee's value, which is now trading at around 71 rupees to the dollar, is now making the country's $200 billion export industry extremely competitive compared to other countries, including China.
