. Telltale has the biggest game collection in the industry, which means that with an opinion articleQ: Accessing a variable that is set through Form_Load() I am creating a program in which there is a log.txt file that is opened with a "Load" button in a simple textbox. Through Form_Load() I set a variable to the contents of the file into a string. I need to be able to display this string as a message in a label. Following is my code: MainForm.cs: public MainForm() { InitializeComponent(); string fileContents = ""; fileContents = File.ReadAllText(@"C:\log.txt"); labelMessage.Text = fileContents; buttonLoad.Click += loadFile; } private void loadFile(object sender, EventArgs e) { MessageBox.Show(fileContents); } I'm expecting to get an error, since this is not my method of accessing that variable. A: You will have to declare that string globally, outside the constructor. So you can't say this. You can try the following code : string fileContents; public MainForm() { InitializeComponent(); fileContents = ""; fileContents = File.ReadAllText(@"C:\log.txt"); labelMessage.Text = fileContents; buttonLoad.Click += loadFile; } private void loadFile(object sender, EventArgs e) { MessageBox.Show(fileContents); } Q: Is there a language that is easier to automatically detect than Python? Trying to find something to try out for an off-hour project that I can do to learn something. I want to try it out for automating some tasks. I've searched for a while but not found a language that is easy to detect for it's code as the first step (or for that matter the only step). I found that normally doing a regex on Python code gets quite a bit of the work done automatically, but I can't think of a language I can try out that has a syntax that doesn't give too much
