In this study, the contribution of the temporal and the facial pathways to reading was investigated. Subjects read a set of English regular words, regular pseudowords, irregular words, and pseudowords in three conditions. Subjects wore one of three goggles that occluded the left, right, or both eyes. Their reading performance was compared on the basis of their visual field. The results suggested that in reading normal words, the orbitofrontal cortex is involved in processing the lexical meaning of the words, and information from the temporal lobe is used to retrieve the phonological form. In reading irregular words, the orbitofrontal cortex is involved in processing the phonological meaning of the words, while only the temporal lobe contributes to their lexical meaning. On the other hand, in reading pseudowords, the orbitofrontal cortex processes their visual form, while both the temporal and the facial pathways contribute to their reading. We discuss the implication of the present findings for models of reading. Synthesis of bifunctional mannose- and heparin-derived linkers and their applications in human-human hybridomas and bioluminescent cell imaging. A heparin-derived linker with a primary amine at the N-3 position was covalently attached to a mannose-derivatized polymer [poly(amidoamine) (PAMAM)] via a mixed glycosidic bond. The reaction of the resultant di-saccharide linker with the human immunoglobulin (Ig) light-chain (Lc) was completely accomplished within 12 h, and the resulting di-saccharide linker was confirmed to be an asymmetrical bridge via the determination of anomeric glycosidic linkage. PAMAM with the di-saccharide linker was used to prepare polymeric nanoparticles (NP) by using a covalent cross-linking method, and was then applied for the generation of human-human hybridomas. The interaction between the concanavalin A (Con A) and the nanoparticles was blocked by the formed PAMAM-di-saccharide linker. The NP showed good biocompatibility with mouse thymocytes, and we
