A slide switch of this type is arranged in a constant current source, a constant voltage source or the like, and has a movable contact member slidably moved within a housing against the bias of a spring to thereby connect a fixed contact member in series with a load. When a circuit such as a load circuit is connected in series with the switch, the switch which has no current limiting feature must be provided with a sufficiently large opening in the housing for inserting or removing the circuit. For this reason, the opening is usually large enough to permit the insertion or removal of the circuit. When a load is connected to the switch, therefore, a large current is apt to flow into the switch and the switch is easy to damage.1. Field of the Invention This invention relates to a receptacle for a herbicide and
