Now, I don't know how to get the time when the handler is called. I would like to measure the time the handler takes in ms, which would be easy if I simply could use System.currentTimeMillis() but I don't know what to do with the return value. How can I get it right? A: Have you tried System.currentTimeMillis() inside your Handler? public class myHandler extends Handler { @Override public void handleMessage(Message msg) { long start = System.currentTimeMillis(); //... do something in here long end = System.currentTimeMillis(); System.out.println("Time taken: " + (end - start)); } } Structure-function relationships and molecular organization of the pore of nucleoside transport proteins. The phylogenetically widespread family of nucleoside transporters has no sequence similarity outside the Nucleoside Transporter Solute-Binding Domain (NT-SBD). However, sequence alignments in the NT-SBD of several transporters reveal a potential structural homology that is consistent with the formation of a phylogenetic conserved tetrameric sub
