measurement of the canine femur in standing and recumbent positions. Intramedullary pressure of canine femurs was measured under standing and recumbent loading conditions to determine the effects of anatomical alignment and position on joint load-bearing capability. Peak pressures in the straight and bowed femurs were greatest under the knee joint in recumbent loading and along the acetabulum in standing loading. Joint pressures under knee loading were lower than those under hip loading, yet hip pressures were more consistent. Recumbent femurs on average held more axial compression loads in stance than did standing femurs. Stance femurs that were bowed did not differ in load-bearing capability from femurs that were straight. Bowing femurs withstood more bending moments in stance than did bowed femurs in recumbent loading. Axial bending loads were also higher in stance than in recumbent loading. Physiologically, therefore, the arc of motion of the femur in stance positions subjects

Investigation of the influence of $\text{pd} \cdot 4\text{PF}_6^-$ as the counterion on the response of CdS quantum dots based sensor. The influence of $\text{pd}\cdot 4\text{PF6}^-$ counterion on the response of cadmium sulfide quantum dots (CdS QDs) sensor was investigated in this research. The chromaticity coordinates of the counterion solution based on the UV-vis spectra change with the cadmium concentration. With the addition of CdS QDs, the shape of the UV-vis spectra changes significantly and response of the sensor is enhanced greatly. The linear range of the sensor extends to 7.3×10^{-7} mol L⁻¹ with the correlation coefficient of 0.998. The limit of detection of the sensor was calculated to be 3.16×10^{-7} mol L⁻¹. The operation stability of the sensor was also investigated. The results obtained proved the sensor prepared by pd.4
